April 24, 2001 LB 541

be ten years before we can determine whether anything of value is going to be done by this program; not ten years to show results but ten year to make that determination. He was praised by the school board in Omaha as having the greatest achievement when he resegregated the schools. The resegregation of the schools is what gave the impetus to that quarter of a billion dollar bond issue that they floated. But they can't buy textbooks, they cannot provide staff, they cannot provide supplies--the basics and the essentials of an education. Yet, when they were getting certain Negroes to try to palm this bond issue off on the black community, things were said in the newspaper such as, when your children are resegregated, they didn't use that word, when they're trundled back to these neighborhood schools there will be adequate teachers, staff, supplies; you will not want for anything. Then a big picture shows up in the newspaper of children in one of these so-called academies transferring textbooks from one room to the other because there are not enough textbooks to go around. And I'm supposed to swallow that? You know what I want? I want these white people who are coming to me now talking about don't hurt the children...our children have been hurting all the time and those white people did not care. They voted to resegregate the schools but now that they think their children might get a whiff of what our children have suffered they come running to me. Well, there should be education for every child or education for no child, and there should be misery for every child or misery for no child. But our children will not be the sacrificial lambs any more. They thought...

SENATOR CUDABACK: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...in Omaha that they wouldn't have to contend with me, and I told them when you get to the Legislature you're on my turf and I'm going to see how much the rural senators are willing to give up in order to let Omaha get what they want. Are they willing to sacrifice the budget to placate Omaha, which has contempt for them anyway? We are going to have a rough, rocky road and I plan to make sure that that happens and I will supply articles and documentation of what I'm talking about.
